Back on August 8, 1993, I stood in the middle of another extraordinary formation at Cherhill Down that measured 445 feet in a wheat field that had no signs of entry on the morning of its discovery.

In the smaller circle below the two overlapping arcs, there were three "whirlpools" or "vortices" laid out in a straight line.

In the bottom nautilus-shape, the meticulously feathered wheat swept around and over another "vortex" that was nearly hidden under the surface swirl.

A couple staying in a bed and breakfast across the road from the formation said there was no design in the wheat field on Saturday night when they went to bed. It was a hot night for England and they slept with their windows open. The woman asked, pondering the manmade controversy about crop formations, "How could people have been out there making this huge thing and us not hear any noise?"
